In the Kitchen

Essays on food and life

'A delightful collection of original, vibrant and heart-warming writing.'
Nigel Slater

In the Kitchen : Essays on food and life

Food can embody our personal histories as well as wider cultural histories. But what are the stories we tell ourselves about the kitchen, and how do we first come to it. How do the cookbooks we read shape us. Can cooking be a tool for connection in the kitchen and outside of it. In these thirteen original essays, writers consider the subjects of cooking and eating and how they shape our lives, and the possibilities and limitations the kitchen poses. Rachel Roddy traces her life through the cookers she has known; Rebecca May Johnson considers the radical potential of finger food; Ruby Tandoh discovers other definitions of sweetness; Yemisí Aribisálà remembers a love affair in which food failed as a language; and Julia Turshen considers food's ties to community. A collection to savour and inspire, In the Kitchen brings together thirteen contemporary writers who brilliantly capture their experiences in the kitchen and beyond.

Dear Nature, Newling, John

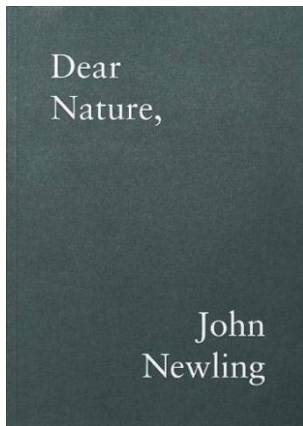

In 2018 artist John Newling spent 81 consecutive days writing letters to Nature. The letters echo the sentiment of a series of letters to a loved one but with a voice of humanity attempting to come to terms with its relationship to nature.

The letters take you on a journey through the history of agriculture, economics, religion and capitalism to the present day. Newling describes the values that have underpinned human endeavour and shaped our world.

But most importantly, Dear Nature describes that which all humans with a conscience, deep down, must feel right now about nature.

This book offers a new state of mind for the future, rooted in balance and respect.
